Two card games from Gottick in Sweden

Comrade Koba

A simple and furious card game of political survival in the era of Soviet history known as “The Great Terror”.

Players try to purge their enemies from the Party while keeping their own comrades alive and close to Koba’s throne.

Koba, of course, is one of Joseph Stalin’s pseudonyms (like “Stalin” itself) – taken from a novel about a heroic bandit in mid-nineteenth century Georgia. Hence, the game is about staying alive under one of the Twentieth century’s great dictators and highlights a disturbing period of modern history.

For 2-4 players, aged 12+, playing time 30 minutes.
RRP £8.50 (inc VAT), Trade £4.34 (ex-VAT).

Supermarket Psycho

All you wanted was some milk and now you’re in a fight for survival! Suddenly all the people in the supermarket look strange. They stare and they scream and they push and they are everywhere. Will you crack? Will you make it out alive?

Supermarket Psycho confronts you with the real life horror of supermarket stress. Will you be the first to snap and – to the other players’ amusement – go crazy? Or will you make them pay in the ensuing food fight?

Supermarket Psycho is a game of bluff and double bluff where you either win as the solitary Psycho or as part of the team taking out the psycho in the name of public safety.

For 4-5 players, aged 12+, playing time 30 minutes.
RRP £10.00 (inc VAT), Trade £5.11 (ex-VAT).
